

Matthew Goldsbrough

The full CV shows Matthew's breadth and depth. This note gives the short version: what to remember, what he is like to work with, and where he is most useful.

What should I remember about Matthew?

Matthew is most useful in the middle stage of growth. He helps boards and management teams turn early demand into repeatable sales without the founder carrying every conversation. He listens to people closest to the work, tests the commercial story against detail and asks direct questions until the practical choice is clear.

His background includes:

- Senior commercial roles at Hyperion and Informatica, with international work across Europe and the USA.
- NED at Britannia Garment Packaging, where the business recorded 3 successive years of balance-sheet growth, strengthened its international partner and supplier network, and won major retail clients.
- 16 years advising boards and management teams through Goldsbrough Consulting Limited across technology, education, finance and manufacturing.

What is he like to work with?

Matthew is calm, prepared and direct. He challenges founders and executives while leaving them in charge. He combines challenge with encouragement, helping executives think clearly, work effectively with one another and act on the decisions in front of them. He asks questions to improve the decision and leaves the argument aside. The aim is a stronger business, with more value in it and less dependence on any one person.

Where is Matthew most useful?

Matthew is open to salaried independent NED appointments in the North East and wider UK, particularly with founder-led or investor-backed businesses built around technology, software, data or tech-enabled services. The fit is strongest when:

- the board needs a clearer view before deciding what to do next;
- the business has grown faster than the way people work together;
- the product is good, but the route to customers or the value is unclear.

He welcomes conversations with founders, investors, chairs and search firms about where he could be most useful.
